CHAPTER VIII.

THE MOUTHS OF THE CATTARO.

And so fatality, which plays so predominant a role in the events of this world, had brought together in Ragues the families of Bathory and Toronthal; and brought them not only to the same Cown but to the same quarter of the own—the Stradone. And Sava Toronthal and Pierre Bathory had seen each other, met each other, loved each other! Pierre the son of a man who had been betraved to death, and Sava the daughter of the man who betraved him !

As soon as the engineer had left the schooner the doctor might have been ward to say to himself :
And Pierre goes away full of hope.

hope he never had before hope that I have just given him!

Was the doctor the man to undertake a merciless struggle against his fatality? Did he feel himself strong enough to dispose the affairs of hamankind at his will? That force, the moral energy, which must be his if he was to succeed in fighting destiny, would it not fail

"No! I will fight against it?" he said. "Such love is hateful, criminal! That Pierre Bathery should become the husband of Toronthal's daughter and one day learn the truth would be to deprive him of all hope of revenge. He could only kill himself in despair. And I will tell him all if need be. I will tell him what this family has done to his. At all costs I will break this thing off

And in truth such a union and seem monstrous. It will be remembered that in his conversation with madame Bathory, the doctor had told her that the three chiefs of the Trieste conspiracy had been the victims of an abominable scheme, which had come to light in the course of the trial, and that this had come to his knowledge through the indiscretion of one of the Pisino war-

And it will also be remembered that Madame Bathory for certain reasons had thought it best to say nothing of this treachery to her son. Besides she did not know who were the traitors. She did not know that one of them was wealthy and respected and lived at Ragusa, a few yards away from her in the Stradone. The doctor had not named them? Why? Doubtless because the hour had not yet come for him to unmask them! But he knew them. He knew that Silas Toronthal was one of the traitors and that Sarcany was the other. And if he had not taken more into his confidence and it was because he reckoned on Pierre's assistance, and he wished to associate the son in the retribution with which he was about to visit the murderers of his father.

And that was why he could not say more to the son of Stephen Bathory, without breaking his heart. It matters little," he repeated. "I shall break off this match.

Having made up his mind, what did he do? Reveal to Madame Bathory and her son the history of the banker of Trieste? But did he hold material proofs of the treachery? No. for Mathias Sandorf, Stephen Bathory and Ladislas Zathmar, who alone had these proofs, were dead. Did he spread through the town the report of this abominable act without first telling Madame Bathory? That would probably have been enough to open an abyss between Pierre and the young lady an abyse that could not be bridged. But if the secret were divulged, would not Silas Toronthal try to leave Ragusa?

But the doctor did not want the banker to disappear. He wanted the traitor to remain ready for the executioner when the day of execution arrived, and were he to disappear events might turn out differently to what he had imagined.

After having weighed the pros and cons the doctor resolved to proceed more vigorously against Toronthal. In the first place it was necessary to get Pierre away from the town where the mor of his name was in danger. Yes! He would spirit him away so that no one could trace him! When he had him in his power he would tell him all he knew about Toronthal and Sarcany his accomplice, and he would associate him in his work. But he had not a day to lose.

It was with this object that a telegram from the doctor brought from the mouths of the Cattaro, south of Ragusa on the Adriatic, one of the swiftest vessels of his fleet. This was one of those lange lanuches which served as the forerunners of our modern torpedo boats. This long steel tube was about forty-four yards in length and seventy tons measprement, had neither mast nor funnel, al carried simply an exterior deck and cage with lenticular scuttles for the steersman, who could be hermetically benut up in it when the state of the sea rendered such precautions necessary. She could slip through the water with-hour. Owing to his excessive speed the doctor had been able to accomplish many extraordinary voyages, and hence the cift of ubiquity with which he had been credited, for at very short intervals of time he had been able to run from the farthest corners of the Archipelago to the ontmost borders of the Lybian Sea.

There was however, one striking difference between steam launches and the Doctor's boats, and that was that instead of superheated steam it was electricity that furnished the motive power by means of powerful accumulators invented by himself long before the later inventors that have become so tamous. In these accumulators he could store the electricity to a practically unlimited extent. These despatch bents were known as electros, with merely a number denoting the order in which they had been built. It was Electric No. 2 that and been telegraphed for to the mouths of the Cathera

Having given these orders, the Doctor waited for the moment of action and wavned Point Pescade and Cape Matifon that he would soon require their services, nd it is hardly necessary to say that they were very glad at having at last an opportunity of showing their devotion. One cloud, one only, threw its shadow over the gladness with which they welcomed the Doctor's warning.

During this time Point Pescade should have met in the Stradone with the mysterious stranger who was evidently on a similar mission, and doubtless he would have done so had not the Moor after scuding off the telegram left Ragusa for some place farther south, where Sarcany would join her. Pescade was not thus interfered with in his operations and towns and chapels, before Stolivo, could carry out his instructions with his before Perasto, a celebrated place of habitual intelligence. Pierre Bathory never imagined that he had been so closely watched, nor did he know for the eyes of the Moor there had now been substituted those of Point Percade. After his conversation with the Doctor, after the avowal he had made, he had felt more confident. Why should be now hide from his mother what had taken place on board the Savarena? Would she not read it in his look and even in his soul? Would she not see that a change had taken place in him and that grief and despair had given place to hope and happiness?

Pierre then told his mother everything. He told her who the girl was that he loved, and how it was for her that he had refused to leave Ragusa. His situation was of little consequence! Had not Doctor Antekirtt told him to hope?

"That is why you suffered so much, my child," answered Madame Bathory. May heaven help you and bring all the happiness we have missed up to now!"

Madame Bathory lived in great retirement in her house in the Rue Martinella. She did not go out of it except to church with her old servant, for she attended to her religious duties with all the practical and austere piety of her race. She had never heard tell of the Toronthals. Never had she looked at the large mansion she passed on her way to the Church of the Redeemer, which is situated just where the Stradone begins, She therefore did not know the daughter of the old banker of Trieste.

And so Pierre had to describe her and tell what she had said to him when they first met, and how he did not doubt that his love was returned. And all these details he gave with an ardor that his mother was not surprised to find in the tender passionate soul of her son

But when Pierre told her of the position of the Toronthals, when she found that the young lady would be one of the richest heiresses of Ragues, she could not conceal her uneasiness. Would the banker consent to his only child becoming a poor man's wife?

But Pierre did not think it necessary to insist on the coolness and even contempt with which Toronthal had always received him. He was content to repeat what the Doctor had said to him -how he had told him that he could, that he ought even, have confidence in his father's friend who felt for him a quasipaternal affection. A fact which Madame Bathory did not doubt, knowing what he had wished to do for her and hers. The Doctor was in search of a lodging. Cape Matifou had followed him without even asking him where they had landed. It might be in Dalmatia, or it might be in China, but it mattered little to him. Like a faithful dog he followed his master. He was only a tool, perhaps, a machine, a machine to turn, to bore, to pierce, which the Doctor kept till he thought the time had come to use it, Having left the quincunxes of the quay they entered the fortifications of Cattaro; then they passed along a series of narrow hilly roads in which is crowded a population of from four to five thousand. As he did so they were closing the Marine Gate a gate which remains open only till eight o'clock at night except on the arrival of the mail boats. TO BE CONTINUED.

this hope, although size was not without anxiety. The house in the Rue Marinella was open to the Doctor, as he knew, and even without this new interest he took in the family for whom he had already shown such sympathy enough to attract him there?

And so Pierre after counting the days and the hours had no longer strength to resist. He must at all costs again see Doctor Antekirtt An invincible force urged him to Gravosa. Once on board the schoener his impatience would be understood, hisaction would be excused, even if it were premature.

On the 7th of June, at eight o'clock in the morning, Pierre Bathory left his mother without saying anything to her of his plans. He left Ragusa and hurried to Gravosa at such a rate that Point Pescade could hardly keep up with him. As he reached the quay in front of the moorings occupied by the Savarena at his last visit he stopped.
